Concept:
All of us will be involved in some level of dispute at some point in our lives—sometimes daily. Consequently, getting better at resolving disputes, helping others do so and having the wisdom to get help when needed is vital. Here are some tips on gaining dispute resolution confidence:

Learn to discern and categorize different types of disputes.
Not all disputes are created equal. Gaining the skills to face and resolve begins with awareness of the nature of the dispute. Disputes fall on a spectrum, depending on what’s driving the dispute, the nature of the people involved and what’s been done to resolve it (or escalate it) to date. When considering a dispute, ask yourself, “what turned this difference into a dispute?” Avoid the temptation to blame the character of people involved. Next, ask yourself, “How have people been affected by it?” Look beyond those directly engaged. Last, ask yourself, “What means have people used so far to resolve or escalate?” With an understanding of these factors, give the dispute a name. For example, call it “a miscommunication-based dispute,” or “an identity-based dispute with a history.”
List as many neutral factors as you can that may be needed to resolve the dispute.

Not all factors are needed in every situation, and some may even be unhelpful in some cases, depending on the type of dispute you have identified. Think broadly both about what will help people involved address the issues, what will help people feel confident in supporting the resolution, and what will help make implementation effective and durable. Factors to consider might include: the level of trust between the parties; an ability to establish or reach common understanding of the facts; perceived neutrality/impartiality of the decision-maker; an ability to expand perspectives; creativity in generating options; and authority to impose a solution in the absence of agreement.

Know what you can offer that will help and when may need to “outsource.”

In nearly all disputes, skill in reflective listening and de-escalation will be helpful. But sometimes it takes skills or perspective someone else might have more than you. For example, you may be good at asking probing questions while a colleague is better at summarizing and the facts of the dispute are complicated. And even the most skilled dispute resolution professional is not right for every dispute. For example, she may have been involved in a dispute with one of the parties in the past. Just as with home repairs, effective dispute resolution may require a person with specialized skills or who has a perspective you don’t have. It’s not a failure to call in help to do what you may not be equipped to do in that instance.
